The Program

We live in an increasingly mobile, global, and changing world which still needs to be explored further. Therefore, qualitative social research is of great importance because it provides in-depth insights into human behaviors, attitudes, and interactions that often cannot be captured by quantitative methods.

Hence, this year's Fulda International Autumn School explores various aspects of qualitative social research. The Autumn School will gather renowned scholars from the associated fields, postgraduates, and students from around the globe in Fulda. In a creative and supportive environment, we will delve into the diversity of qualitative research. Together, we will engage in discussions on fundamental epistemological issues and contemporary methodological debates in qualitative social research.

The Autumn School is aimed at everyone who is currently conducting qualitative research or plans to do so in the future. The program provides a space to share and discuss experiences, questions, and data, and is intended to help advance one's research and network with others. Therefore, among different group sessions and keynotes, three parallel methods workshops are offered over the three days, allowing participants to delve deeply into their own planned or current projects. Participants are welcome to bring research ideas, exposés, research designs, or data to be discussed and further developed.
